Excerpt: . . . to treatment, we again fear that little more can be offered than the radical one of extraction; but, before we resort to this extremity, iodide of potassium, in somewhat large doses, should have a trial. It is always of service to place such teeth in a normal condition, by having them meet their antagonists properly; this may require modification of their shape by filing, or grinding with corundum wheels on the dental engine; sometimes capping the adjoining ones to relieve undue pressure, and at others, where no antagonizing tooth is present, inserting an artificial one. Counter-irritation, as a blister over the root, by painting the gum with the saturated tincture of iodine, is also serviceable. These remedies may be quite effective if applied early; but after the disease has progressed to the extremity described, benefit might be derived from cutting away the hypertrophied portion...
