Excerpt: .last nine miles of the way cost us six hours time to conquer them, and indeed we had never done it if our good master had not several times lent us a pair of horses out of his own coach, whereby we were enabled to trace out the way for him After reading such an account, it is difficult to understand why any one preferred coach to horseback on a cross-country journey. No wonder Gay was goaded Who can recount the coach s various harms, The legs disjointed, and the broken arms? In the wide gulph, he says in another place, the shatter d coach o erthrown Sinks with the snorting steeds; the reins are broke, And from the crackling axle flies the spoke. Yet, according to Swift, Gay was not so averse to the coach in his later years. Writing to him in 173 1, the Dean says: -- If your ramble was on horseback, I am glad of it on account of your health; but I know your arts of patching up a journey between stage-coaches and friends coaches: for you are as arrant a cockney as any hosier in Cheapside. You love twelve-penny coaches too well, without considering that the interest of a whole thousand pounds brings you but half a crown a day. A coach and six horses, he goes on to say in another letter, is the utmost exercise you can bear, and this only when you can fill it...
