Any announcement made by Paul Ehrlich is always received with a great deal of expectation and interest and perhaps none more so than that of his recent achievement in finding a synthetic chemical product which apparently has a specific toxic action on the treponema pallida. The enthusiasm to which this announcement gave rise in Europe has probably not been equaled since Kochs publication of his work with tuberculin. This preliminary announcement has been followed by a large amount of clinical experimental work with the preparation both abroad and this side of the water. It can be said now without hesitation, that the remedy has a remarkable effect on the lesions of primary and secondary syphilis and of the distressing symptoms of the tertiary form of the disease. And now that we are to look...
